

Kevin Spalink

The final assignment following the completion of the third project served as a way to determine the final grade. Feeling confident in my knowledge, I approached the assignment with a belief in my capability to get a good grade. However, the outcome was unforeseen and served as a significant learning experience.

Even though I felt sure at first, I couldn't answer the first question. This made it hard for me to answer the other questions well. In the end, I didn't do the assignment as well as I wanted, and I didn't meet all the requirements.

Looking back, I failed because I didn't prepare well enough and thought I was more ready than I actually was for the test. I realized after the test that I should have spent more time learning and getting ready for it.

The most important thing I learned from this experience is how crucial it is to spend time getting ready for tests, even if I feel really confident about what I already know. If I don't prepare enough, it can cause unexpected problems and make the final result worse.

Moving on, I'll use this experience to motivate myself to prepare more seriously for upcoming assignments. I'll be more disciplined in my approach, making sure I really understand the material well, which should increase my chances of doing better next time.